

I can't say that I have very much experience with learning styles. I didn't really notice much focus on learning styles throughout elementary, middle, and high school. I can remember taking a few online quizzes here and there asking about our learning styles, but nothing really changed based on our answers. Although there is a lot of buzz around learning styles right now, I don't really think that is being implemented in schools as much. Just from what I've seen, I feel as though there is a much bigger focus on making sure students are prepared for standardized tests than there is for actually teaching kids how to function in adulthood. In my opinion, there isn't much value in trying to match different learning styles in the classroom when subject matter and goals for the students stay the same. I think this is also why we aren't seeing any improvements from trying out different learning styles. If the goal of school is to get students ready for a test, instead of getting them ready for life or teaching them things they actually might care about, then it doesn't really matter whether it's taught through videos over books. It's still not going to engage the students or help them learn.
